

Architectural Style and Form: Colonial Revival (1880-1955)

Growing interest in classical design and greater regard for more “correct” composition encouraged the development of the Colonial Revival style. Most Colonial Revival buildings have contained rectilinear massing, broken perhaps by bay windows; symmetrical facades with central entrances; front porches with columns and classical balustrades; relatively uniform roofs, sometimes elaborated on the façade by a cross gable or a row of dormers; and window shutters. Palladian windows, corner pilasters, and garland-and-swag trim are common decorative elements. Often the entry door is accented with a decorative surround or entry porch, a feature far less common to original Colonial houses.

Sources indicate that this building was initially constructed in the 1850s, with later 1940s alterations. While this may be possible, the building's current appearance is more of a Colonial Revival style, utilizing a Greek Revival door surround with a Palladian window in the closed front-gable on the front façade.

The Key Bank building is a good example of the Georgian Revival subtype. Note its symmetrical appearance, slightly projecting central pavilion with quoins and a pediment, and its articulated entry door.

The models for the Colonial Revival style homes in America were originally constructed by English colonists arriving in the late-seventeenth century. These early colonists modeled their homes after the half-timbered houses of England, but adapted the style to the stormy New England climate. Over time a sturdy and practical, modest, one- to one-and-a-half-story, regularly planned and often symmetric house with wooden shutters emerged. In the late 1800s and early 1900s, a renewed interest in America's past inspired a variety of Colonial Revival styles. Colonial Revival Cape Cod houses became especially popular during the 1930s. These small, economical houses were mass-produced in suburban developments across the United States.
